I have never forgotten my tenth birthday... It is not only because of the gleaming silver bike my mother gave me that I remember it so well. I tried it out at once, in my pyjamas. In an ecstasy of joy and pride I rode it round and round the block, hoping all my friends would be up early and watching out of their windows, admiring, and seething with envy too. But even my memory of that has diminished over the years. It was when I came home, puffed out and glowing, and sat down for breakfast, that my mother gave me something else too. It is this second gift that I have never forgotten. I can't honestly remember what happened to my beautiful bike. Either it rusted away at the back of the garage when I grew out of it, or it was thrown away. I don't know. I do know that I still have this second gift, that I have never grown out of it and I will never throw it away. She put down beside me on the kitchen table what looked at first like an ordinary birthday card. She didn't say who it was from but I could see that there was something about this card that troubled her deeply. "Who's it from?" I asked her. I wasn't that interested at first - after all, birthday cards were never as intriguing as presents. She didn't answer me. I picked up the envelope. There, written in handwriting I did not know, was my answer: For Carlos, a letter from your father... "He wanted me to keep it for you, until your tenth birthday." So I opened the card and read. Dearest Carlos, I want to wish you first of all a very happy tenth birthday. How I should love to be with you on this special day. "
